Virginia investigations show similar patterns consistent with 30 metro areas nationwide of racial disparities in the maintenance of bank-owned and Fannie Mae-owned foreclosures

Full Nationwide Report Released: <http://bit.ly/1xaEFCX>

WASHINGTON, DC – Today, HOME, the National Fair Housing Alliance (NFHA) and 16 other organizations announced the results of a major investigation into the failure of banks and property preservation companies to maintain and market foreclosed homes in African-American and Latino neighborhoods. The investigation of Real Estate Owned (REO) homes in 30 major metropolitan areas found disturbing incidents of discrimination in how these banks and Fannie Mae’s preservation management companies fail to secure the doors and windows, mow lawns, fix gutters and downspouts, remove trash and provide other maintenance for REOs in African-American and Latino neighborhoods, while providing these services for their REOs located in White neighborhoods.

A report detailing the findings of the investigation, “Zip Code Inequality: Discrimination by Banks in the Maintenance of Foreclosed Homes in Neighborhoods of Color,” was released today. It details the results of the investigation of more than 2,400 REO properties located in and around 30 major U.S. cities. The report is the third released by NFHA (similar reports and results were published in 2011 and 2012) and provides information about the broadest investigation to date into REO discrimination. Both the white neighborhoods and neighborhoods of color investigated were middle and working class communities with high foreclosure rates and high owner-occupancy rates. The investigation avoided zip codes with high levels of renters or investor-ownership.

“This report documents the ongoing threat to communities of color across America: that zip code determines whether banks properly maintain and market the homes titled in their names,” said Shanna L. Smith, President and CEO of the National Fair Housing Alliance. “The banks and property preservation companies are under contract to maintain these homes. They are supposed to get the best price when selling a foreclosed home. Banks and Fannie Mae are obligated to make sure lawns are mowed, shrubs are trimmed, mail is stopped and flyers are removed from the porch. They are also responsible for ensuring that the gutters are cleaned to stop water or ice damage, windows and doors are secured and repaired, trash and dead animals are removed, emergency numbers that actually work are posted and professional “For Sale” signs are placed in the yard. Banks fulfill these obligations in predominantly White neighborhoods but overwhelmingly fail to perform these simple routine maintenance chores in middle and working class African American and Latino neighborhoods.”

In Virginia, NFHA and HOME have REO-related complaints pending with the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development against Deutsche Bank, U.S. Bank, and Cyprex (Fannie Mae’s field service vendor in charge of maintaining REOs in Virginia). Many of the same neighborhoods investigated are at issue in several complaints, compounding the negative health, safety and economic effects of unmaintained foreclosures on current homeowners in the neighborhoods. "HOME spent over 675 hours to conduct investigations on hundreds of REOs in Virginia," said Heather Crislip, President and CEO of Housing Opportunities Made Equal of Virginia, Inc. "Virginia's results clearly support the nationwide pattern of discrimination in the marketing and maintaining of foreclosures."

The failure to maintain homes based on the racial or ethnic composition of a neighborhood violates the federal Fair Housing Act and has a toxic effect on the health and livelihood of entire communities, according to Stephen M. Dane, a Washington, D.C., civil rights lawyer who has written on the subject and whose law firm represents HOME, NFHA, and other fair housing groups in several of the matters pending before HUD. The allegations outlined in the report illustrate continuing violations of fair housing law. The law is clear that banks, property preservation companies and trustees with properties titled in their names are covered by fair housing requirements.

"Rather than implement effective quality control measures or terminate vendors who fail to maintain REOs, banks assert they are not responsible for the vendors they hire because they are 'just the trustee' or they claim another servicer is at fault. However, the Fair Housing Act is clear that the owner of the property is liable. So when the REO is titled in the trustee's name, it is responsible under the law," explained Smith.

The National Fair Housing Alliance in Washington, D.C., and 17 of its member organizations, investigated the maintenance and marketing of REO properties on a 100-point scale, subtracting points for broken windows and doors, water damage, overgrown lawns or shrubs, accumulated leaves, invasive plants/weeds, no "for sale" sign, trash on the property, broken steps or handrails, holes left uncovered and other contractual maintenance items. In Virginia, HOME conducted the investigations in the Richmond and Hampton Roads regions.

The REOs examined were located next door to well-maintained homes. Neighbors suffer from these poorly maintained homes when their property values drop. "Poorly maintained foreclosures create health and safety concerns. Local governments see their tax revenues significantly reduced while their costs for nuisance abatement and police and fire protection increase," said Smith. "The housing recovery will continue to lag in middle and working class communities of color as long as these banks and Fannie Mae's vendors fail to properly maintain the homes they own. This is unacceptable since everyone is being paid to simply conduct routine maintenance and preserve the asset."

Metropolitan Areas Where REO Investigations Were Conducted

The investigations took into account over 30 different aspects of the maintenance and marketing of each property. Some key findings of the investigation include:

- REOs in communities of color were 2.6 times more likely to have 10 or more deficiencies than REOs in White neighborhoods (32.0% vs. 12.4%).
- REOs in communities of color were 2.2 times more likely to have trash accumulated on the premises than REOs in White neighborhoods (47.5 vs. 22.0%).
- REOs in communities of color were 2.4 times more likely to have unsecured, broken, or boarded doors than REOs in White neighborhoods (30.0% vs. 12.7%).
- REOs in communities of color were 2 times more likely to have unsecured, broken, or boarded windows than REOs in White neighborhoods (47.1% vs. 23.5%).

Each bank is supposed to correct these problems. Here are some examples of even more striking disparities in areas profiled:

- In Hampton Roads, VA, REOs in communities of color were 6 times more likely to have unsecured, damaged, or boarded doors than REOs in White communities.
- In Memphis, TN, REOs in communities of color were 8.8 times more likely to have significant amounts of trash and debris left behind on the property than REOs in White communities.
- In Miami, FL, REOs in communities of color were 3.7 times more likely to have overgrown grass or dead leaves on the property than REOs in White communities.
- In Kansas City, MO/KS, REOs in communities of color were 3.6 times more likely to have damaged, broken, or boarded windows than REOs in White communities.

The Fair Housing Act makes it illegal to discriminate based on race, color, national origin, religion, sex, disability or familial status, as well as the race or national origin of residents of a neighborhood. This law applies to housing and housing-related activities, including the maintenance, appraisal, listing, marketing and selling of homes.
